ONCE my old Daddy had a flock of sheep
Fed on a mountain's brow:
'Twas high as Teneriffe, for aught I know;
— And twice as steep;

So the old codger, and myself, together,
Fenc'd round the brink, to keep these nannies in;
For they took lessons from an old bell weather,
Who oft gallanted them thro' thick and thin:
Aye! let him lead, and over hill and hollow,
E'en to the very d—l——; they would follow!
He rather tho't this fence
Accorded ill with his ideas of freedom;
And hence
Determin'd o'er the top to lead 'em.

The place where he resolv'd to take his leap,
Was just upon the verge; outside was steep;
'Twould make the noddle swim, to look below;
Yet still he was quite careless what might be
Upon the other side, so o'er went he!
And lo!
Impell'd by gravitation, neck and heels;
Down the poor weather tumbled, bell & all!
He bleated murder, while his bell rang peals;
And reader, wouldst believe that great and small;
Soon as their headstrong leader, they did miss;
Each tho'tless ventur'd the untri'd abyss;
And quick as you could say Jack Robinson,
They, every one;
The sucklings, and their dams;
The frisky ewes, and little butting rams;
As Niagara from its bed did pour,
Or Lucifer, they fell—to rise no more!

This mournful tale has one short application:
It fits each factious scoundrel of the nation;
Who tho' perverse, headstrong & ignorant;
Foreseeing a chasm is too proud t' recant;
But strives, unwearied, like the old bell weather,
To draw all down the infernal gulph together!

TRANSFORMATION OF THE CATERPILLAR.

[From the change of the "crawling Caterpillar," into the gay Butterfly, reference is often made to the resurrection of man. The following beautiful lines on that subject, are from Shaw's General Zoology]

"The helpless crawling caterpillar trace
From the first period of his reptile race.
Cloth'd in dishonor, on the leafy spray
Unseen he wears his silent hours away,
Till, satiate grown of all that life supplies,
Self-taught the voluntary martyr dies.
Deep under earth his darkling course he bends,
And to the tomb, a willing guest, descends.
There, lying secluded in his lonely cell,
Forgets the sun, and bids the world farewell.
O'er the wide waste the wintry tempest reign,
And driving snows usurp the frozen plain.
In vain the tempest beats, the whirlwind blows;
No storm can violate his grave's repose.
But when revolving months have worn their way,
When smile the woods, and when the zephyrs play;
When laughs the vivid world in summer's bloom,
He bursts and flies triumphant from the tomb.
And while his new-born beauties he displays,
With conscious joy his altered form surveys.
Mark: while he moves amid the sunny beam,
O'er his soft wings the varying lustre gleam.
Launched into air, on purple plume she soars,
Gay Nature's face with wanton glance explores;
Proud of his various beauty wings his way,
And spoils the fairest flowers, himself more fair than they!
And deems weak man the future promise vain;
When worms can die, and glorious rise again!"

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MR. EMOTT'S SPEECH.

On Mr. Macon's bill on the motion to adhere.

Once more from the state of the European world it appears necessarily to result that British navigation will not speedily decrease. All Europe is in a state of war and there is scarcely a merchant vessel afloat which does not belong to Great Britain.—It seems to follow that the continental nations must have recourse to British shipping to carry away and barter their surplus productions.

Do we want any proof of the flourishing state of British commerce and navigation under the French decrees. We have it I think in abundance. We have it in the daily accounts of arrivals in England of large fleets of merchantmen from the Baltic, a sea surrounded by nations who on paper have adopted the French regulations. We have it in the list of vessels from Holland, a country which has not only incorporated the French decrees in its laws, but which is in a state of open and actual hostility with England, and yet the ship news has announced the arrival of not less than twenty merchantmen from that country in a single port in England in one day. We have it in the licences which are openly granted by the British government to its subjects to trade with the continent, and indeed with France itself. If the French decrees really sealed up the continent against the British as many seem to imagine, it is strange that the merchants, who generally understand their own interest, would solicit those licences, or that the government would grant them.

If we want farther proof we have it in the price of British goods which the dealers in them say are on the advance and which shews that the demand for them is not decreasing. But above all we have it in that best of mercantile thermometers the receipts of the customs. From the late English papers it appears that the British customs for the last year have gone much beyond the financial estimates, but that they exceeded the receipts of the former year upwards of one million six hundred thousand pound sterling or more than seven millions of dollars.

But there are still farther reasons for believing that the British shipping will not soon want employment. Let it be recollected that almost all the French and Dutch colonies in both hemispheres have changed masters and that their productions which formerly gave activity and profit to so many neutrals, are now carried by the English. The extent and importance of this trade is well known in this country; it has for many years been a standing topic of discussion in this house and our official papers as well as public prints have evinced the vast injury done us by the British in their attempts to circumscribe and fetter it as carried on by neutrals. Let it also be recollected that the war as it has been conducted by the French emperor, has thrown open to the English the Spanish and Portuguese possessions in South America, which embrace almost the whole of that continent.—The trade of that country is now carried on almost exclusively by the British and has therefore given much additional employ to British shipping.

Let us then banish the idle apprehension if indeed we entertain it, that the British will attempt to rival us in our ports and in our own trade because they want employment elsewhere. The thing under existing circumstances is altogether improbable. Besides, let me ask gentlemen if they have apprehensions on this subject whether it is not in time to provide for the evil when we are sure it is approaching? We ought not to legislate on a possibility so remote, on an event which though some may fear, no thinking unprejudiced man expects.

That these regulations are unnecessary is also proved by a recurrence to our situation at the commencement of our restrictive system. British merchant vessels were then at liberty to enter our waters and yet all our ships and all our sailors had employ; it was not then believed or suggested that English enterprize exceeded American enterprize, or that the British could rival us in our trade and in our own waters. The class of citizens interested in shipping require nothing more from us than to be placed where we found them; no aid of ours has been asked or even hinted at, and if we do thus gratuiously interfere, believe me sir, they are to suffer by it.

If however an American navigation act is necessary or desirable, is this such an act or will the provisions struck out by the senate, if they could be reinstated, benefit the navigation interest? This is an enquiry of some importance, for if it shall appear that the system is altogether worthless, gentlemen who have taken this ground for adhering to the original proposition, and by this means continue the non-intercourse, will consent to take the law as it now stands—The bill as it just came into this house was said to be a substitute for the non-intercourse, which was a substitute for the embargo. This system of substitution has not the appearance of stability. If this bill had passed, those who knew its progenitors and recollected their sickly and disordered state, would not calculate on long life to the child.

We are to bear in mind too that the commercial or navigation provisions were to expire by the very terms of the law with the last day of the next session which might be prior to and could not go beyond the fourth day of March and that they could be annulled by the executive before that time, in case he made arrangements with the belligerents. Is it possible to conceive that these temporary, uncertain regulations can benefit the shipping interest or that any man would be idle enough to build a single vessel in consequence of this ephemeral system? Let us not deceive ourselves, this is not a navigation act.

But is there not danger that the bill might have the effect of destroying the very interest which we profess by it to encourage? What let me ask would be the effect of a retaliatory regulation by the British? It is said indeed that there is no danger of retaliation—perhaps not. Indeed the advantage which the British would receive under this law would probably render it a favorite with them; for if I mistake not in connection with the French decrees and the French practices under these decress, will make Great Britain our warehouse and her people our factors, and this is one reason which induces me to vote against the bill as it went from this house. But as to retaliation we are to recollect that Great Britain is much governed by her own interest, and if she sees her interest in it, we must expect that she will retaliate.

Put the case that the English adopt corresponding regulations, that they prohibit any exports or imports in American vessels, what will then take place to the operation of this system? Some gentlemen who are friendly to the restrictive regimen appear to think that it will give an embargo more effectual than the former, because it will be enforced by the British navy. But it will not be an embargo. The few last years have afforded us some experience on this subject. Notwithstanding our restrictive regulations our productions found their way out of the country and British goods found their way in. Such assuredly would be the case if these conflicting systems were put in operation. Our productions would be deposited in Amelia Island on the south and Nova Scotia and Canada on the north to be carried away by the British vessels and the British merchants would have there a supply of goods which would find their way into the country by stealth and smuggling.

In such a state of things what would become of the shipping interest? Is it not obvious that our ships and sailors would be permanently thrown out of employment and that all our trade would be carried off in British bottoms, the thing we appear to be so solicitous to guard against? And what would render our situation the more intolerable and oppressive, is, that we would not have it in our power to shift off this system as we did the embargo. It must continue not merely as long as we choose, but during the pleasure of Great Britain, for we must bear in mind that if she does not lead the way in these "navigation" projects, but treads in our own footsteps, we shall have no just cause to complain, either of the commencement or the continuance of the system by her.

Nor will the evil be confined to the shipping interest; it will be felt by every portion of the community, and particularly by our farmers and planters. We know that one of the effects of the restrictive system, is to enhance the prices of European articles, and that we are now taxed severely by it. Again: while our farmers are paying an advanced price on the articles they purchase, they must as they now do, sacrifice their prodnctions. The merchant who will undertake to send off the productions of the country, must do it at much expence and trouble, and will require a profit not only equal to his capital and the risque, but so as to enable him to pay the freight of his vessel both out and in as she must return empty. The prices at the place of deposit will necessarily be low, as there will be many sellers and few buyers, and the second purchaser will expect another profit equal to another freight in and out as well as compensation for his time and trouble, and as an advance upon the capital he employs. All these profits must come out of the pockets of the farmer, as they so far lessen the price which he obtains. Is not all this verified by late experience?—While American articles were scarce and dear in Europe, was the farmer at all bettered by it? On the contrary, was he not driven to sell his productions, if indeed he could sell, at a great sacrifice and at very reduced prices?

Without giving more into detail I am satisfied that the provisions of this bill which have been struck out by the senate are not called for by the situation of our country, or by the true policy of this government, and that their operation, if enacted, might be ruinous to our commercial and agricultural interest: and I trust that the gentlemen on the opposite side of the house, who have by their votes declared a willingness to get rid of the non-intercourse by passing this law incumbered with these provisions, will consent to take it without them.

Some gentlemen, however, appear unwilling to repeal the non-intepcourse law without a substitute, inasmuch as they think they see in such repeal submission to the decrees of France and England and a censure on those who favored the restrictive system. This system many yet profess to believe would have been altogether sufficient for the purposes of coercing the belligerents, if it had not been evaded. I will not take up the time of the house in examining what in an unknown state of things might have been the effect of the embargo or the non-intercourse on France or England. With respect to our own country, nothing happened but what might have been foreseen. Whenever by an unlimited embargo you throw a vast number of your citizens out of their usual employ and render the surplus productions of many others useless, it is in human nature to evade the law if it can be done. Want and ruin are deadly enemies to that kind of patriotism which would lead to an observance of such a system. Gentlemen may if they please charge the evasions of the embargo to a particular denomination of politicians, but you and I, Mr. Speaker, know better. In this respect we were indeed all federalists and all republicans.—Persons of every political church were equally concerned and equally active in the evasions.

IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE.

The lowing information from London, to a gentleman of this town, is handed us by one, who is incapable of knowingly abusing the public confidence for a single moment. It is unquestionably derived from an authentic source; and our readers we think may perfectly rely on its truth.

"In a formal communication from lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney, the conduct of our executive and the proceedings of congress, subsequent to the late negociations, are censured in the most unequivocal manner.

"It is asserted by the British cabinet that Mr. Jackson behaved only as his duty required; that the charge against him is groundless; and that he, as well as king and country, are treated with an unprecedented rudeness and grossness by the United States.

"Lord Wellesley beginning with the offer to renew Mr. Jay's treaty, recites a series of facts, proving the sincere and uniform desire of Great Britain to meet the United States on fair and friendly conditions, all which have been met with a contrary spirit by the government of the United States: and he says, that now it is the belief of the British cabinet, that every overture of conciliation, on their part must be unavailing, because our government are resolved that no adjustment of differences shall be made; and he adds, that although they are disposed to receive propositions from us, yet it cannot be concealed, that none can be at present expected.

"Lord Wellesley took this occasion to remark, that the British government are fully sensible of the great part that is assigned them to act in the present eventful period of the world, and to declare explicitly, that all the means which God has graciously given them, shall be used so far as is necessary, to resist the establishment of despotism, which would be more terrible than any yet known in the history of nations."

From the Repertory, March 30.

FURTHER IMPORTANT EXTRACTS.

Besides the particulars of the note of lord Wellesley stated above, & which we assert with the most perfect confidence, may be relied upon as correct, we add the following, which with no less assurance we announce as truth.

"The British goverament in their official communication to Mr. Pinkney censure the publication of secretary Smith's letter to Mr. Pinkney, of the 23d of November, and consider Mr. Pinckney's statement to them on the 2d January as bottomed on that letter. They were led at first, to hope that the dispute was entirely personal, and expresses great regret as well as indignation to discover it almost entirely national.——They consider the justification of prescribing written communications, exclusively to Mr. Jackson, by the case of Mr. Canning as a mere pretence, and Mr. Pinckney is confidently appealed to for his knowledge of facts which justify this imputation.

"The proceedings of the American government are animadverted on strongly;—but Mr. Pinkney himself is treated with great civility."

This is the unhappy consequence of the management of our government towards England, in all their late negociations with her, rendered at least unequivocal, by their outrageous abuse of Mr. Jackson. This the democrats will use every detestable means to conceal from the people as long as possible, at least until after the election. But we solemnly assure our readers, our brother editors throughout the state, and the community at large, that such is our situation with Great Britain, and that the facts above stated must and will soon transpire in an unquestionable shape. The British government feel themselves very injuriously treated; and are offended. They consider all their efforts to make a friendly settlement with us as fruitless, and but giving occasion for fresh indignities. They will not send another minister of high rank or of any rank, to be burnt in effigy by the mob, and traduced and insulted by government. They despair of effecting an accommodation, by any efforts of theirs, and they will make no more attempts.

Congress of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, APRIL 5.
[CONCLUDED.]

[Taken for the Alexandria Gazette.]

The committee went through the examination of the post routes as far as the state of Virginia. When, on motion of Mr. Randolph, the committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

A message from the president covering a communication from the secretary of state, relative to the impressment of American seamen, made agreeably to an order of the house, was read and ordered to be printed.

FRIDAY, April 6.

Mr. Smilie laid on the table a resolution to make 10 o'clock in the morning the hour to which the house shall adjourn, for the remainder of the session, instead of 11, the usual hour.

Sundry private petitions, reports on petitions and local bills were presented and referred.

The house then went into committee of the whole on the report of the committee of claims on the petition of John Murray, Mr. Desha in the chair. The committee disagreed to the report of the committee of claims, which was on account of the statute of limitation unfavorable. The committee also disagreed to the report on the petition of Lucy Dixon, which had been referred to the same committee; as also the reports on the petition of Authur St. Clair and David Blackwell. Likewise on the bills for the relief of Margaret Lapsey, Jno. Thompson, John Minor and Moses Young. The committee rose and reported bills in favor of the above.

The bill for the relief of Margaret Lapsey, Lucy Dixon, Arthur St. Clair and David Blackwell, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed. The bills for the relief of John Thompson, John Minor, and Moses Young were ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

The house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the bill for the relief of William Baylan—Mr. Desha in the chair.
